INDEX

TO THE

ENCYCLOPÆDIA BRITANNICA

THIRTEENTH EDITION

VOLUMES 29 TO 31

The following index gives the references to the Three New Volumes of the Encyclopædia Britannica (13th Edition) which covers the history of the age in which we now live—the eventful years from 1910 to 1926. In the complete set these volumes are numbered 29, 30 and 31; as New Supplementary Volumes they are numbered in Roman letters I, II and III. In this index they are referred to simply as i, ii and iii.

This index has been prepared on the same principles as the index that precedes it, a full description of which will be found in the front of the volume on pages v and vi. The same abbreviations also are used here as in the preceding pages. They are for the most part self-explanatory, but if the reader is in doubt he may refer to the key given on pages 1 and 2 of this volume.

CLASSIFICATION OF ARTICLES ACCORDING TO SUBJECT

A GENERAL encyclopaedia is more than a storehouse of unrelated facts. In its alphabetical array of articles it holds in solution a series of encyclopaedias on all the various departments of knowledge, ready to be precipitated by the reagent of classification. In The Encyclopædia Britannica the subject of Astronomy, for example, is treated not only in a general article under that title, but in more than a hundred articles scattered through the alphabet from Aberration and Alidade, through Parallax and Penumbra and Perigee, to Zenith and Zodiac, in separate accounts of the planets and stars, and in biographies of the great astronomers of all countries and all ages.

The following pages present a systematic subject-catalogue of the contents of the Thirteenth Edition. This Classification is in two sections. The first section, on pages 927 to 991, covers Volumes 1 to 28, and constitutes a survey of the world's history and of the developments in human knowledge down to about the year 1910. The second section, on pages 992 to 1006, covers Volumes 29 to 31, and presents a view of the world in which we now live, the tremendous events through which we have come from 1910 to 1926 and the leading actors in those events, the advance in science and industry and art and the humanities and the persons to whom we owe that advance.

The two sections of the Classification have been prepared on the same general plan. In both, the articles are classified in the same twenty-four large groups, under such general headings as Art, Biology, Literature. Within this general framework the subdivisions of each group in the section for Volumes 29-31 correspond as closely as possible to the subdivisions in the section for Volumes 1-28. Some variation was made necessary by the changes in relative importance of certain subjects; the emergence of new topics of special interest in some fields of knowledge and the relative inactivity in other fields. A new subdivision, Aviation, for example, has been inserted in Group IX, Engineering. In Group XII, History, subdivisions 8 and 9 have been added to provide for The World War and International Relations. On the other hand, such a topic as XII. 3. (j) in the first section, Holy Roman Empire, does not appear in the second section of the Classification.

This arrangement of the Classification—in two sections following the same general outline—makes it possible for the student of any subject either to begin with its present status and recent history and work back into its more distant past, or to begin at the beginning and follow it down to the present. It also affords the possibility of interesting comparisons between the past and the present by merely looking at the two sections themselves. Group X, Geography, is the most obvious illustration, showing, as it does, the political configuration of the world both in 1910 (in the first section of the Classification) and in 1926 (in the second section). Quite as impressive, if less obvious, are the changes in other groups: the new subjects which appear in Chemistry and Physics; the lengthening list under Economics and Social Science; the relatively static condition of some of the other groups. Still more impressive than any of these superficial changes, is the record that is written in the articles themselves, to which the Classification points the way.

The classifying of so great a mass of material is necessarily to some extent arbitrary. The article on Motor Vehicles, for example, in Volume 30, discussing in its numerous sections the economic aspects of the industry, technical problems of construction, laws regulating the use of motor-cars, taxation of owners, and motor races, belongs properly in Groups VII, IX, XIII, XV, and XXIII. In the first section of the Classification the principle was adopted of entering each article only once, in the group to which it owed its primary allegiance. In the second section, with a much smaller number of articles to be classified, there was more latitude for duplication of entries, and accordingly the important articles were listed in more than one group if they contained substantial contributions to the understanding of more than one subject.

The biographical sketches appear, in both sections of the Classification, in connection with the subject in which the person has done his best-known work. In the case of persons who appear in both sections it occasionally happens that one is listed in a different group in the second section, because he has shifted his activity from the field in which he was conspicuous in his earlier days to another in which he has been better known recently. In the second section, furthermore, a man equally conspicuous in more than one field may be found in two or more lists.

Groups X and XII, Geography and History, are mutually complementary in the two sections of the Classification, since most of the articles under topographical headings contain historical information. Both Group X and Group XII, moreover, supplement Group VII, since they include accounts of natural resources and of the economic and financial and social development of the countries and their subdivisions and cities.

The classification cannot undertake to exhaust the resources of the Encyclopædia on any particular subject. There is still a place for the imagination of the student. It does, however, furnish him a suggestive guide. If it does no more than stimulate his curiosity and give him a start, he will find himself launched on a course of reading and investigation with fascinating possibilities.

The second section of the classification, covering Volumes 29, 30 and 31, covers the events of the years from 1910 to 1926. It follows the general plan of the preceding section, which covers Volumes 1 to 28. The main groups, from I through XXIII, are the same in both sections. Group XXIV is not needed in the second section. Sub-divisions of the main groups in the second section follow as nearly as possible the sub-divisions in the first; but they have been modified when necessary. The lists of biographies in the second section includes many names which are found also in Volumes 1 to 28. Usually they are classified under the same heading in both sections, but in some cases a change in activity has made a change in classification appropriate.
